End of Unit Assessment: How 'modern' was Britain by 1750?

Scaffolding & Hints:

- Intro: Define what historians mean by a 'modern' state and state your overall argument.
- Para 1 (Modern): Discuss the Financial Revolution (Bank of England), constitutional monarchy (Glorious Revolution), and global trade (East India Company, Triangular Trade).
- Para 2 (Un-Modern): Discuss the brutal social realities — the Bloody Code, chattel slavery, fewer than 5% of men could vote, women had no legal rights, urban poverty (Mudlarks, Gin Craze).
- Para 3 (Evaluation): Was the wealth of 1750 built on exploitation? Can a society be called 'modern' if its prosperity depends on slavery?
- Conclusion: Reach a nuanced judgment. Perhaps Britain was economically modern but socially medieval — a 'modern veneer over a brutal reality'.

Exam Sources & Interpretations

Source A

Interpretation 1 (based on Paul Langford, 'A Polite and Commercial People', 1989): By 1750, Britain was already the world's first truly modern state. The Civil War and Glorious Revolution had replaced absolute royal tyranny with a constitutional monarchy governed through Parliament. The Bank of England (founded 1694) had invented the modern system of national debt and paper credit, allowing Britain to out-finance every rival in Europe. A vast global trade network stretched from India to the Caribbean, and over 1,500 miles of turnpike roads connected the nation. In commerce, finance, and political freedom, Britain was two hundred years ahead of the continent.

Source B

Interpretation 2 (based on J.C.D. Clark, 'English Society 1688–1832', 1985): The idea that 18th-century Britain was a 'modern' nation is a dangerous myth. In reality, it remained a deeply traditional, unequal, and brutal society. Less than 5% of the male population could vote, and corrupt 'rotten boroughs' allowed wealthy aristocrats to buy their way into Parliament. The terrifying 'Bloody Code' imposed the death penalty for over 200 minor crimes. Britain's economic wealth was built entirely upon the barbaric machinery of the Transatlantic Slave Trade, in which millions of Africans were treated as property. For the vast majority of the population — the urban poor, women, and enslaved people — 1750 Britain was not modern at all.
